Should the public be allowed to contest closure motions?

David M. O'Brien

8 The seduction of the judiciary: social science and the courts

It's tempting for judges to make greater use of social science in their decision-making. But it could reduce the legitimacy of their rulings and weaken constitutional rights.

and Wayne E. Bohannon*

22 Juror characteristics: to what extent are they related to jury verdicts?

In terms of sex, race, age and education, jurors who vote to convict are not very different as a group from jurors who vote to acquit, a new study suggests.

William P. McLaughlan

32 An exploratory analysis of the Supreme Court's caseload from 1880-1976

Before we prescribe remedies for the heavy caseload of the Supreme Court, we should carefully examine the way its work has grown over the last 100 years.
